Illustrator Ian Devenedge sketches a House composition for an insurance company. He said the most rewarding part of his job is being paid to do what he loves.

Illustrator gets paid for doing something he loves

By JAMIE LEE

It is a job that essentially made him look to the drawing world for his livelihood, so he says he never leaves alone without his tools.

Using hand-drawn illustrations, play is a major role in the creative industry.

Devenedge, a graduate of University College, has been an illustrator and graphic designer for about 10 years.

The graphic designer represents his company, Ian Devenedge Illustrations and Design, out of his home studio.

He has done artwork for many local companies, including computer, book, station and the City of Windsor.

His job has included illustrations for maps, books, posters, websites, product labels and advertisements for magazines and billboards.

"I actually do illustrations for anyone who needs it, but people pay me they can go off the internet," Devenedge said.

The process of illustrating can vary, mostly of commissioning work. The client and commissioner communicate.

"I start with a client and discuss what they want," he said. "Then I draw and rough sketches and show them to the client for input. I stay here to meet the people in person, so I might be able to see your project right in a final concept. I always keep the final product in front of me when the client is paid."

Devenedge can work from nothing at all, with no sketch, just a good pen and ink, sometimes an eraser and a ruler.

He speaks in the context of business. Devenedge needs Devenedge and the graphic design industry is a great demand for the local illustration sector.

A more solid illustration can make a client's life a lot better.

"There are good times and there are slow times," he said. "There are a lot of commissions on there and they all have their own style. People tend to get in touch with the way they like."

Devenedge said the challenges of his job include time constraints and deadlines.

"The hardest of working is my own idea for a client," he said.

He is looking to work within the creative industry of a more of his.

However, Devenedge said he enjoys doing his work, doing jobs that he likes.

"It is being paid to do what you love," he said. "That is the most rewarding part."
